Incisive Insights Newsletter – April Issue

Recent events have made it clear that the consequences of being unprepared for major business disruptions are significant. This new normal has forced organizations to quickly assess and course correct controls and processes to minimize disruption. Unfortunately, the time and effort spent reacting can't be recouped.

Which is why it's more important than ever to establish solid risk mitigation strategies and invest in solutions that keep businesses running smoothly – while ensuring data accuracy and consistency -- despite unforeseen events and repercussions.

Knowing circumstances can change at any time, having confidence in the data that drives your business is priceless. To learn how your business can succeed in a dynamic, ever-changing environment, read the CRO Guide: The Path to Risk Resilience.

Many firms deal with countless currencies in today's global economy, but improperly categorizing them in spreadsheets (mistaking Canadian or Singapore dollars for American ones, for example) is a human error that can easily happen. Unfortunately, it can also be very costly and pose real implications for a company's employees and customers, as well as its shareholders. Enterprises must be able to mitigate this spreadsheet risk in order to protect their revenue and reputation.

You should be able to trust your data, but odds are you don't. 70% of auditors report that few finance industry professionals such as CFOs, controllers, financial analysts, auditors and accountants actually trust the accuracy of the data they produce from their spreadsheets. One survey indicated that 38% of the people most responsible for keeping track of the data actually trust it. So it was no surprise when multiple companies suffered adverse market effects following announcements that included currency errors based on inaccurate data.

To Err is Human, But it is Not Inevitable
